MEMORANDUM OPINION

The court has before it the motion for summary judgment filed by defendant, Steward Machine Company ("Steward") on September 26, 2005. The third amended complaint of plaintiff, Lee McGhee ("McGhee"), contains what plaintiff styles as three counts. Count One claims age discrimination in Steward's decision to terminate McGhee. In Count Two, McGhee asserts three independent alleged violations of 42 U.S.C. § 1981: wage discrimination based on race, wrongful termination based on race, and failure to rehire based on race. In Count Three, McGhee invokes Section 501 of ERISA, 29 U.S.C. § 1140, claiming discrimination in the form of McGhee's termination in retaliation for his use of Steward's health plan and/or interference with his right to obtain benefits under that plan. For the reasons hereinafter discussed, Steward's motion for summary judgment is due to be granted as to every claim but the failure to rehire component of Count Two.

Facts¹

McGhee, a black male, began working with Steward in 1967. He worked in the yard from 1967 to 2004, with the brief exception of a temporary lay-off in 1994 and 1995, holding various positions and undertaking various duties including painting and sandblasting. Soon after his return in 1995, McGhee was promoted to Yard Foreman, a position in which he supervised as many as ten fellow employees. He was 53-years old at that time. David Worsham, a white male, was Steward's assembly/shop supervisor, and had been for six years prior to McGhee's promotion to Yard Foreman. Although Worsham was paid more than McGhee, he supervised as many as 80 employees.

Steward began to experience a downturn in business as early as the Winter of 2002, culminating in the decision to undertake a reduction in force ("RIF") in February 2004. Because of the reduced workload, Whitney Debardeleben, President and CEO of Steward, decided to eliminate the position of Yard Foreman, along with a number of other positions. Although Steward was converting to self-insurance at the time Debardeleben made the decision to eliminate McGhee's position, he had no knowledge of how the employees used Steward's health plan. In February 2004, McGhee was being treated for hypertension and asthma. His wife had received benefits from Steward for back surgery in roughly 1994.

After being notified of his termination, McGhee had a conversation with Charles Debardeleben, Steward's Vice President and General Counsel. In that conversation McGhee said that he would like to return to work at Steward in the future. McGhee did not, however, apply for the position of painter/sandblaster when that position opened in April 2005. Steward hired Brandon Ellington, a 20-year old white male, to fill that position.

Analysis

I. Age Discrimination

The prima facie burden for wrongful termination under the ADEA in a RIF case requires proof: (1) that the plaintiff is a member of the protected age group; (2) that he was qualified to assume another position at the time of the RIF; and (3) that the employer intended to discriminate in its decision to terminate the plaintiff. Williams v. General Motors Corp., 656 F.2d 120, 129 (11th Cir. 1981). McGhee's claim of age discrimination fails at the summary judgment stage, because he has failed to provide evidence supporting one of the essential elements of his prima facie case.²

The second component is the operative one for this analysis. McGhee urges the court to read the second element literally, but the better interpretation--both logically and in its consistency with Eleventh Circuit precedent--reads a requirement of availability into the second prong. See Earley v. Champion Int'l Corp., 907 F.2d 1077, 1082-83 (11th Cir. 1990). Therefore, where a "particular job position is entirely eliminated for nondiscriminatory reasons, for plaintiff to prevail against his employer he must show that he was qualified for another available job with that employer." Id. at 1082-83. McGhee has introduced no admissible evidence to suggest that his position was not entirely eliminated,³ and Steward has introduced undisputed evidence that its business experienced a downturn prior to the RIF. It is not the court's role to second guess Steward's response to negative economic forces. Beaver v. Rayonier, Inc., 200 F.3d 723, 728 (11th Cir. 1999). Because McGhee has presented no evidence that there was any other available position at the time of the RIF, his prima facie age discrimination case is deficient. For that reason, the court does not reach the issue of whether McGhee has proffered sufficient evidence of Steward's intent to discriminate.⁴

² McGhee admits in his reply brief that he has failed to produce any direct evidence of age discrimination. The court agrees that the statements presented do not amount to direct evidence, and thus this discussion focuses solely on circumstantial evidence of discrimination.

³ McGhee does state in his deposition that he heard from "someone" that Haskell Phillips replaced him as Yard Foreman. As this inadmissible hearsay is the only evidence in the record that does not point toward the elimination of McGhee's position upon his termination, and the record does contain admissible evidence to the contrary, there is no genuine issue as to whether the position was actually eliminated in the RIF.

II. Race Discrimination

A. Wage Discrimination

To prove his claim for wage discrimination under § 1981, McGhee "must establish that (1) []he belongs to a racial minority; (2) []he received low wages; (3) similarly situated comparators outside the protected class received higher compensation; and (4) []he was qualified to receive the higher wage." Cooper v. Southern Co., 390 F.3d 695, 735 (11th Cir. 2004). McGhee's wage discrimination claim fails because he has not proffered evidence of a proper comparator. The only comparator offered is David Worsham, the assembly/shop supervisor. Although Worsham was paid more and is white, he is not sufficiently similarly situated in that he (1) has supervised as many as 80 employees compared to McGhee's ten, (2) has been employed by Steward in his supervisory position for 15 years compared to McGhee's nine, and (3) supervises different employees and duties. Without a proper comparator, McGhee's wage discrimination claim fails as a matter of law.

B. Wrongful Termination

McGhee's claim of race discrimination in Steward's decision to terminate him requires proving the same prima facie elements as his age discrimination claim (although, obviously, he must now prove that the protected characteristic is his race rather than his age). It follows logically that McGhee's claim for wrongful termination is due to fail for the same reason that his age discrimination claim fails: he has introduced no evidence that there were any available positions which he was qualified to assume upon the termination of his employment.

C. Failure to Rehire

To carry the prima facie burden for a failure to rehire claim, a plaintiff must ordinarily introduce evidence showing that (1) he applied, (2) for an available position, (3) for which he was qualified, and (4) the employer hired an individual outside of his protected group. Jameson v. Arrow Co., 75 F.3d 1528, 1532 (11th Cir. 1996). The hiring of Brandon Ellington, a white male, to fill an open painter/sandblaster position in April 2005 satisfies both the second and fourth elements. McGhee's experience performing painting and sandblasting duties establishes his qualification for that position. Furthermore, due to a genuine issue of material fact as to the first element, the court must conclude that McGhee has satisfied his prima facie obligation for summary judgment purposes.

McGhee admits that he has not actually applied for any open position since his termination, relying instead on the conversation with Charles DeBardeleben, in which McGhee expressed a general interest in returning to work for Steward in the future. While on its face the Jameson test requires a plaintiff to submit an application for any open position, the Eleventh Circuit has had more than one occasion to revisit this issue. See Smith v. J. Smith Lanier & Co., 352 F.3d 1342, 1345 (11th Cir. 2003); Carmichael v. Birmingham Saw Works, 738 F.2d 1126, 1133-34 (11th Cir. 1984). These cases stand for the proposition that an application for an open position is an element of the plaintiff's prima facie burden only if the employer provided formal notice of the job opening. See Smith, 352 F.3d at 1345-46. Therefore, if Steward's hiring process "relied on word of mouth and informal review procedures," id. at 1346, McGhee's generalized statement of interest would be sufficient to meet his prima facie burden, because the employee must only provide such notice to the employer as to create "some reason or duty to consider him for the post." Carmichael, 738 F.2d at 1133. However, if the record reflects that Steward had formal hiring procedures in place and used them, McGhee cannot make out his prima facie case because he did not apply for the position. The parties' briefs have not directed the court to any admissible information in the record, nor can the court find any such information, which resolves the question of what process Steward followed in filling the open painter/sandblaster position in April 2005.⁵ This constitutes a genuine issue of material fact, then, that prevents the court from granting summary judgment to Steward on this claim.

Under the McDonnell Douglas framework, once McGhee has produced evidence sufficient to establish his prima facie case, the burden shifts to Steward to articulate legitimate, nondiscriminatory reasons for its failure to rehire McGhee. McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 802, 93 S. Ct. 1817, 1824 (1973). While Steward's motion for summary judgment did not attempt to articulate any such reason, Steward's reply to McGhee's opposition to its motion does contain one purportedly legitimate reason for the failure to rehire McGhee: that the open position was not Yard Foreman, McGhee's prior position, but the painter/sandblaster position. The court is left to conjecture as to how the discrepancy in job descriptions proves that the failure to rehire McGhee is not discriminatory, and whether McGhee--if given the opportunity--can show that such an explanation is pretextual. This the court will not do. Summary judgment is inappropriate on this claim.

⁵ This is not to say that the record is completely devoid of information related to Steward's hiring practices. The record is replete with such information, but the issue is nevertheless unresolved. Whitney Debardeleben, for example, states that Steward does not have a general policy, but that he "believes" that employees involved in a RIF knew that the company would contact them when positions became open. This statement would certainly indicate that Steward followed informal hiring practices. On the other hand, Whitney Debardeleben also describes a process whereby certain positions are posted in the shop, and then advertised in the newspaper if not filled internally. Nevertheless, there is a genuine issue as to the type of hiring process used to fill the actual position for which McGhee claims he was qualified. The court must therefore draw all reasonable inferences in the favor of the nonmovant, McGhee.

III. ERISA Discrimination

Section 501 of ERISA prevents conduct "designed either to retaliate for the exercise of a right or to interfere with the attainment of an entitled right." Owens v. Storehouse, Inc., 984 F.2d 394, 398 (11th Cir. 1993). Therefore, to survive a summary judgment motion, "a plaintiff must present evidence of the employer's specific intent to violate ERISA." Id. at 399 (citing Gavalik v. Continental Can Co., 812 F.2d 834, 851 (3d Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 979, 108 S. Ct. 495 (1987)). McGhee can establish a prima facie case for ERISA retaliation "by showing (1) that he is entitled to ERISA's protection, (2) was qualified for the position, and (3) was discharged under circumstances that give rise to an inference of discrimination." Clark v. Coats & Clark, Inc., 990 F.2d 1217, 1223 (11th Cir. 1993) (citing Turner v. Schering-Plough Corp., 901 F.2d 335, 347 (3d Cir. 1990); Dister v. Cont'l Group, Inc., 859 F.2d 1108, 1114-15 (2d Cir. 1988)). Neither of the first two elements is in dispute.

McGhee can prove the third element of his prima facie case by introducing evidence either (1) of Steward's intent to retaliate against him for using the health plan, or (2) of Steward's intent to interfere with his receipt of health benefits in the future.⁶ McGhee seeks to prove this element of his prima facie case by showing that he was being treated for hypertension and asthma at the time of his termination, his wife had undergone back surgery in the early 1990s, and Steward converted to self-insurance around the time of his termination. McGhee's proffered evidence is insufficient to carry his prima facie burden.

First, McGhee's evidence does not tend to prove a retaliatory intent. Logically, any claim of retaliation cannot survive summary judgment unless the employee can introduce evidence that the decisionmaker knew about the conduct against which he is alleged to have retaliated. Goldsmith v. City of Atmore, 996 F.2d 1155, 1163 (11th Cir. 1993). That is, McGhee must show that Whitney Debardeleben had knowledge of McGhee's use of the health plan prior to the termination. The only evidence in the summary judgment record bearing on this issue, Whitney Debardeleben's denial that he had seen any information indicating which employees had used or could use Steward's health plan, is uncontroverted. Without proving a causal link between his use of the health plan and his termination, McGhee has not met his prima facie burden as to retaliatory intent.

⁶ Although the argument could be made that Section 501 creates two distinct causes of action--retaliation and interference--neither Eleventh Circuit precedent nor the parties to this litigation have distinguished between the two claims. See, e.g., Owens, 984 F.2d at 399. Therefore, this court treats the ERISA discrimination claim as a single cause of action which provides a remedy for either of two violations: intentional retaliation for exercise of ERISA-protected benefits or intentional interference with future ERISA-protected benefits. The generalized prima facie case, as articulated in Clark, can accommodate either formulation.

Second, the record does not reflect an intent to interfere with McGhee's future health benefits. In this context, McGhee must show that "his termination was motivated by a desire to interfere with his ERISA rights rather than an attempt to cut costs in general." Clark, 990 F.2d at 1225. While, under some circumstances, a "substantial savings in benefit expenses," id. at 1224, can be sufficient to prove an intent to discriminate, McGhee simply has not met this burden. Evidence proving the magnitude of the savings to Steward by eliminating McGhee's health benefits is conspicuously absent from the record. Without such evidence, and without any other information from which the court can reasonably infer that the termination of McGhee resulted in such substantial savings that an inference of ERISA discrimination is warranted, McGhee has failed to carry his prima facie burden. Compare Turner, 901 F.2d at 348 (holding that the failure of an employee to present any evidence of the magnitude of the employer's savings due to the employee's termination was insufficient to support an inference of discrimination), with Dister, 859 F.2d at 15 (holding that evidence indicating that an employee was fired four months before his pension plan vested, resulting in $550,000 of savings to the employer, was sufficient to support an inference of discrimination). Summary judgment is due to be granted on McGhee's ERISA discrimination claim.

Conclusion

In accordance with the foregoing, Steward's motion for summary judgment will be granted in part and denied in part by separate order. Because the court has not relied upon anything which Steward's motion to strike McGhee's affidavit complains about, that motion is moot.
